[redacted] is certainly interested in getting in the intelligence community. He is willing to sell [redacted] his ideas or even simply a place to "reflect" when our offices get too busy. He makes a point of how [redacted] methods are "only one example" of how [redacted] can help the intelligence community; however, he doesn't discuss any other examples.

I think, as a minimum, we should discuss a contract of this general type with several corporations and perhaps educational institutions. It seems that the potential benefit could be considerably greater if we enter into this effort in a competitive spirit; rather than simply follow sole sources with [redacted]
